¹Assuming all bets are exactly the same value, and bets are generally on the lower risk options (evens, pair, 3-line), then this result is statistically significant.

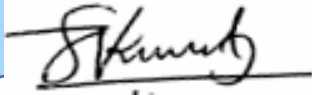

If however any of the following are true:

- All bets were on single numbers (rather than low paying bets like evens)
- OR, if a small number of bets were larger than the others (e.g. 1/6 of bets being larger than the rest would make this result within expected limits)

Then there is no problem. There is not enough data to indicate a game fault.

¹Any RTP between 85% and 113% will pass a 95% confidence interval test.

So an RTP of 103.3% is well within 95% confidence statistical limits.

Note that you generally need thousands of games for confirming statistical significance for measured game RTP. We suggest measuring over more than 3 months to get more games to make your test meaningful. There is not enough data to indicate a game fault.

¹The observed RTP is below a 95% confidence interval for the number of games played, even if playing a single number bet. Players could be re-betting their stake (reducing their RTP). For example, re-betting total stake 3 times on a single number will make this observed result within 95% confidence limits. Monthly RTP results vary, making a game fault less likely but still possible.

The actual RTPs shown above are percentages of total actual winnings to bets for each game type. iTech Labs has done checks to verify the integrity of the game logs. iTech Labs also maintains a copy of the game logs for verification purposes.

iTech Labs certifies that the RTPs were calculated correctly from the game logs based on the actual bets and winnings and that the actual RTPs are greater than normally required by international gaming jurisdictions.

¹There is less than 1 in a million chance of this result assuming all bets are the same size and the game is fair (random and correctly coded). So this is a statistically significant variation, or some of the below assumptions are invalid. If some bets are larger than others, the large bets have a more significant effect on RTP than the small bets, and a wider variation is expected. So if 10% of bets were larger than the rest, the result does fall within a 95% confidence limit. If players were targeting some game flaw we would expect to see high RTP continuously for that game, or that class of games. This does not appear to be the case based on monthly result review.

Looking at the monthly results separated by game type, there is no specific evidence pointing to a game fault: based on the above assumptions most games are within 95% confidence, with 2% above expected and 7% below expected. (In strategy games, players usually do worse than the theoretical RTP due to strategy errors.)

²There is less than 1 in 100,000 chance of this result, so it is statistically significant based on assumptions. Assumptions are: all bets the same value, and the game is fair (random and without bugs).

If some bets are larger than others, the large bets have a more significant effect on RTP than the small bets, and a wider variation is expected. So if 10% of bets were larger than the rest, the result does fall within a 95% confidence limit. Another way players can lose more than expected is to re-bet their winnings, so this could be occurring. Re-betting your winnings effectively reduces RTP, as you re-pay the house edge each cycle. The observed result of 83% RTP is within 95% confidence if players re-bet their winnings 4 times. Monthly results show the roulette games are usually within 95% confidence, making a game fault less likely.
